Be Healthy is excited to continually develop our educational model around the three pillars of health: physical, nutritional and emotional.

Emotional health is of equal importance when it comes to achieving overall 'healthy living.' Studies have shown that physical and emotional health are interconnected with each other. People who find themselves fighting against depression will often be at higher risks for physical health issues such as obesity, hypertension, and heart disease. There are studies that have found a connection between mental illness and turning to alcohol and other substances for coping. Substance abuse as a coping strategy directly impacts physical health. Over time, poor mental health can lead to poor physical health and poor physical health can in turn lead to even poorer mental health. People who are aware of their mental health and focus on caring for themselves mentally will often see improvement in their physical well-being as well as their relational well-being. Relational health is a vital component in mental health. If people are engaged in relationships that are causing them stress, their mental well-being is likely to struggle. Family support is found to be very helpful and can be a catalyst that leads to becoming mentally healthy. When families foster resilience, they are able to cope with challenges that negatively impact their mental, emotional, and relational health. As families and individuals focus on mental health, they will find that it will positively impact other areas of their lives and allow them to become healthier overall.

Be Healthy has recently launched the I AM Be Healthy campaign. We have a question for everyone to start thinking about; what does being healthy mean to you? Be Healthy has learned that each individual has a unique perspective about what health is. Being healthy is different for every person. Please join us and explain what be healthy means to you by posting on our Facebook wall! We can't wait to see what everyone has to say!
